Dassault/Dornier Alpha Jet

In the 1970s, France and Germany collaborated to produce the Alpha Jet, intended as both a trainer and for close support. Considerable numbers of the Alpha Jet remain in service.

First flown in October 1973, the Alpha Jet was produced in two distinct series: the Alpha Jet E, with E standing for Ecole ('School'), optimized for the training role, which was the primary function France required from the type, and the Alpha Jet A, with A standing for Appui Tactique ('Tactical Support') for ground attack. The latter role was of primary interest to the Germans, though the Luftwaffe AlphaJet was one of many export successes for the Alpha Jet while the aircraft remained in French Air Force or in the training role. Belgian authorities in fact acquired 20 Alpha Jets in 2004 and refers to the Canadian Top Ace company.

also employed a number of Portugal-based Alpha Jet As for weapons training. Germany retired its Alpha Jets in the 1990s and sold its fleet to Portugal and Thailand, the latter nation operating the type until the present day. Some German examples were acquired by the private company Top Aces, which owns 60 ex-airframes, though not all are airworthy, and utilizes them for various government training programmes in Canada.

French service: France still operates the Alpha Jet E as a lead-in trainer and all other nations that retain the type operate Alpha Jet Es, notably Nigeria which employs the type as an armed combat aircraft and which has conducted multiple Alpha Jet air strikes against Boko Haram militants since 2014.

As Thutmose III became important to be based on the west bank of the Nile within the domain of the great god Amun-Ra. From about 1500 to 1000 BC, kings and a few powerful family members or court officials were buried in tombs dug into the sides of the Valley of the Kings, where they could be more efficiently guarded. Although their burial places might be secret, many New Kingdom kings built temples for their cult in a great acropolis in the Thebes. From north to south, these include Medinet Habu (Ramesses III 1184-1193 BC), the temple of Amenhotep III (1370-1352 BC), the Temple of Ramesses II (1279-1213 BC), the temple of Hatshepsut (1473-1458 BC) at Deir el Bahari and the temple of Sen (1294-1279 BC).

— then (2.5 miles) south of the great temple to Amen-Ra at Karnak and connected to it by the Avenue of Sphinxes.

Luxor Temple was dedicated to a separate fertility-related manifestation of Amun, Amunhotep, and was built by the king of Egypt around their divine association with Amun for each year during the Opet festival, which saw the divine of that god travel to Luxor from his sanctuary at Karnak.

Although there was a temple here from at least the Middle Kingdom, the greater part of the complex was created under Amenhotep III. This includes the sanctuary of Amunhotep at the southern entrance to the temple in which the four deities of Amun-Ra, Mut, Khonsu, and the moon god Khnum.

Their son) rested during the Opet festival and other structures to the south including a pillared hall leading to the sanctuary and the magnificent open court of the temple surrounded by two lines of pillars on three sides.

To the north of the court, Amenhotep III began construction of a roofed colonnade, which was eventually completed by his grandson Tutankhamun (1323-1327 BC). Ramesses II added a further court and the iconic pylons of the temple with its seated and standing statues of the king together with the remaining 25m (82ft) obelisk (the pylon can be seen in the Place de la Concorde, Paris).

Such was the cultural importance of Luxor Temple in defining the relationship between the ancient Egyptian ruler's semi-divine status and Amun-Ra, that the edifice appears to have re-emerged during the occupation. Amenhotep the Great constructed a new obelisk chapel within Amunhotep III's sanctuary soon after entering Egypt, and, in front of the sanctuary, a chapel dedicated to the Roman imperial cult was built around AD 200. Although this chapel was not consecrated to a Christian deity, the remains of several Coptic Christian churches are known, one of which underlies the edifice and another (1257 AD) of the much-revived cult of Luxor. Sakhmet (Hathor), which predates the court built by Ramesses II.

KARNAK

The vast, sprawling (10 hectares (25-acre) complex at Karnak (Fig. 10) 'The Most Sacred of Places') contains a number of temples surrounding that of Amun-Ra at its centre. To the north (outside the enclosure walls) there is a temple to Montu, the original falcon-headed war god of Thebes who was displaced by Amun. To the south of the enclosed precinct for the Temple of Mut, consort of Amun, and within the walls there is a temple to Khonsu, the son of Amun and Mut. There are also around 20 other small chapels and temples associated with the site. With purpose, a double Amunhotep IV (1352-1336 BC) (Akhenaten) added a temple to Aten (the sun disk) outside the enclosure to the east, which was later

Pyramid of Khafre, Giza Plateau
Built for the great pharaoh Khafre in 2510-2502 BC — the second son of Khufu, and fourth king to rule during the Fourth Dynasty — this pyramid is the second largest in size after the Great Pyramid of Giza. Dating back to around 2500 BC, it is the most impressive of monuments to be found in the Giza Plateau. It was constructed on a higher elevation than the Great Pyramid, giving it the appearance of having an extra 5m (15ft) in height. In reality, the pyramid is 44m (145ft) tall.

Pyramid of Menkaure, Giza Plateau
Completed in the twenty-sixth century BC, this is the smallest of the three great pyramids located on the Giza Plateau. The Pyramid of Menkaure has a height of 67m (220ft) and was built for King Menkaure, the son of Khafre and grandson of Khufu.
